Not illustrated. 1828 Excerpt: ...Very healthy adults have asserted that they never dreamt. Dreams are generally confused and irregular, but occasionally discover extraordinary marks of reason. The power of corporeal stimulants is very great in producing dreams; v. c. of the semen in producing lascivious trains of ideas, of excessive repletion in causing frightful appearances. There is an instance on record of a man, in whom any kind of dreams could be induced, if his friends, by gently addressing him, afforded the subject-matter. This, however, appears to be a preternatural state between sleeping and waking; as does also the truly diseased case of sleepwalkers, and the very different, though morbid, affection of somnambulists seized with what is termed magnetic ecstasis. Locke and others have regarded all dreams as a species of this mixed state. (E) I Schulze, Psychische Anthropologie, vol. i. p. 277. 2d edit. (A) Respiration also proceeds more slowly. The lessened power of evolving heat is strikingly shown by the greater cooling power of a cool air, and the facility with which persons take cold. It is generally thought wise in this country to cover the head preparatively to a nap in...
