Not illustrated.1920 Excerpt: ... THE IDEALS OF THE GENTLEMAN He whom a dream hath possessed knoweth no more of doubting, For mist and the blowing of winds and the mouthing of words he scorns; Not the sinuous speech of schools he hears, but a knightly shouting And never comes darkness down yet he greeteth a million morns. HE ideal is a light which reveals a goal of effort, and invests all familiar means with a fresh significance. It is a measure which sifts men, and institutes competitions. It is a courier announcing the near arrival of a new reality. Its beauty softens the will to flexibility, its pure humanity touches the feelings, its difficulty challenges all the talents to awake. It is through the appeal of the ideal that men are aroused, instructed, and governed. We never know what a body of men can do, nor what can be made of a department of life, until the appropriate ideal appears. It was an ideal, communicated by the mouth of a prophet which aroused the sparse population of an ignored ADMINISTBATOK and barren corner of the world, and caused the Arab to bestir himself, to learn his letters, to consolidate his government, to multiply his numbers, and to assemble the armies which carried his empire from India to the Pillars of Hercules. When the freshness and appeal of his vision departed, he began the slow process of shrinking back within his original boundaries. Every department of life needs periodical renovating with new ideals, to dissolve the traditions which tend to incrust it, to lift it out of the drudgery into which it tends to sink, and to arouse energy and reunite men. No realm of human endeavor stands in greater need of the invigorating effect of a new group of ideals than does productive industry--the world of manufacturing, transporting, and trading. It is true that gr...
