Not illustrated. 1911 Excerpt: ...of the rural population in the cities during the war of independence. There have been, on the other hand, cases that could not be connected with these causes. It becomes every day more apparent, therefore, that we must differentiate between the essential form of beriberi, which is caused by starvation and which is a disease evidently akin to scurvy, and a true pseudo-beriberi, characterized by a polyneuritis similar anatomically with that of true beriberi, but differing in nature just as the epidemic anterior poliomyelitis differs from the affection produced by varied and well-known organisms. The cases recently observed by me in the Santa Clara jail were cases of acute beriberi in individuals accustomed to a fair and varied diet. The etiologic factor here was very virulent, since out of seven persons affected, four died with the striking phenomena of precordial angor, from cardiac dilatation, shown by the autopsy to have been very marked, and in one case accompanied with pericardial effusion to the amount of four hundred cubic centimeters. Samples of the rice consumed in the jail showed it to be polished rice. A bacteriological study of these samples showed the presence of numerous spores capable of resisting the boiling temperature (100C.) for twenty minutes. By the destruction in this wise of other saprophytic germs, the spores are left in pure culture. This highly amyolytic germ produces glucocides a few hours after the cooking of the rice. The germ produces also valerianic acid and probably butyric acid and low grade alcohols. These facts I consider important. The qualitative and quantitative analysis of these products is the subject of further investigations.

HftThe spores in cooked rice are transformed in a few hours into long filaments which later...
