Not illustrated. 1856 edition. Excerpt: ...for in the country, are now good for nothing, as the cotillon stop is the only thing fit for people of fashion; and so we are twisted and twirled till my joints ache again; and, after all, we make, I believe, a very bad figure at it. Indeed, I have not yet ventured to try my hand--my fr.t, I mean--before any body. 5. But my sister-in-law, who is always praised for every thing she does, would needs try her cotillon steps at the assembly, and her partner, Captain Coupee, a constant visitoi at my brothers, told her what an admirable dancer she was; but, in truth, she was out of time every instant, and I heard the people tittering at her country fling, as they called it. And so, in the same manner, (which I do not think is at all fair, Mr. Lounger,) the captain one day, at our house, declared she sang like an angel (drinking her health in a bumper of my brothers champagne); and yet, as I walked behind him next morning in Princes street, I overheard him saying to one of his companions, that Mushrooms dinners were very good things, if it were not for the bore of the singing, and that the little Nahobina squalled like a pea-hen. 6. But, no doubt, it is good manners to commend people to their faces, whatever one may say behind their backs. And, I perceive, they have got fashionable words for praising things, which it is one of my sisters lessons and mine to have at our tongues ends, whether we think so or not. Such a thing, she tells me (as she has been taught by her great companion, Miss Gusto,) must be charming, another ravishing (indeed, Mr. Lounger, that is the word,) and a third divine. As for me, I have yet got no farther than charming; I can only say ravishing in a whisper; and as for divine, I think there is
