

The Gospel of a Country Pastor : Sketches and Sermons

This volume of fourteen chapters was published in 1922. Excerpt from the Foreword: Take care of truth, and beauty will take care of itself: this has ever been my method and I am now too old to change it. In the hands of a priest the height of art is not to conceal art, but to ignore it. I write to be understood and thereby to do good: I care not whether the reader is pleased or not with my words. When a man is strong and in good spirits, says Liddon, he likes to toy with style and speculations ; but when he is sick, and suffering, and has another state of existence looming, however indistinctly, before him, he desires truth; a truth, too, which dares to assert itself as truth, which knows its responsibilities, its frontiers, its premises and its consequences, its foes and its supporters. To talk at the bedside of a dying man as if you were doubtful about your words, or afraid of offending literary susceptibilities, would be the acme of ridicule. Religion may have it has a literary side; but speaking broadly, literature is one thing, and religion is another and an infinitely higher and more sacred thing than literature. It is because our Lord's words go straight to the heart and soul of man that He shows Himself to be the Master of the absolute Religion; and that he gives us a warrant that what He says will not pass away. All must admit that to give a new edge to truths blunted by use, it is not needful that they should be clothed in language either gorgeous or elegant; but only that their expression should be such as we are not accustomed to ; such as to make us stop and listen. Since, then, each individual has his own individual language and accentuation, it is always helpful to hear from others truths which, formulated in our own way, pass through our ears without friction and therefore escape our attention. For this reason it does not seem altogether presumptuous or unreasonable to flood the market with religious books, provided the author can claim personality of manner and disclaim all pretence at novelty in point of matter. A new gospel is not worth listening to ; while to say the old things in the old words is tire some. In his latest book, The Holy Earth, L. H. Bailey, the Nestor of rural writers, has just told us that a man cannot be a good farmer unless he is a religious man. That this sentence is true no one can deny, for a farmer s life is one of sacrifice and uncertainty; his labor lasts practically all day; few are his diversions and many are the risks he runs; more than any other man he depends upon the good pleasure of God, who sends rain and drought, sun- shine and storm, success and failure. And if a farmer is not in the habit of looking heavenwards, the burden of the day becomes almost unbearable at times on his shoulders. Farmers need God in the days of disaster and poverty, that they may be enabled to carry on their work and never be discouraged; they need Him also in the days of prosperity and rich crops, that they may make good use of His gifts for themselves and for humanity. May this handbook of spiritual agriculture lead us all to Him, the Friend of the Farmers and Master of the Harvests!
