Excerpt: ... and I believe I may say to the general satisfaction and surprise of the spectators. Diseases of the most obstinate nature, which had baffled medical art, were removed by the Metallic iraclors: and many persons of an advanced age, who had been crippled for years with the chronic rheumatism, were, in several instances, perfectly cured. By most of those who witnessed the surprising effects of these operations, the discovery was considered as one of the most happy and important that has ever been made for the benefit of mankind. The many stubborn and indisputable facts, which demonstrated that the operations ha4 no similitude whatever to Animal Magnetisim, began now to remove prejudices, and gain it reputation. By many of his best friends, the discoverer was strenuously advised to avail himself of the advantages of the patent law, which was framed for the purpose of promoting the progress of useful arts, and to secure to himself the advantages derivable from what they conceived so happy a discovery. As he had a large family, had put himself to considerable expence in pursuing his ideas to this pleasing result, and, by neglecting all % his his other concerns for the prosecution of his fa vourite object, had injured his circumstances, ke at length determined on this measure, and, accordingly took put a patent in the United States. By this patent the exclusive right of making, constructing, using, and vending to others to be used, his pointed metallic instruments, in removing various pains, &c. is granted to Dr. Perkins, his heirs, administrators, and assigns, for fourteen years and all other persons are inhibited to make or use his instruments without his licenee. Having effected this, and furnished
